

During the COVID-19 shutdown, many restaurants we frequented pre-pandemic adapted to new business models by meeting demand with drive-through, curbside pick-up, and delivery, among others. Then with reopening, many transitioned a portion of their parking lot to outdoor dining. As states and municipalities adjusted to the reality of the pandemic, so too did restaurants. Though not all were able to adapt accordingly or faced other issues that forced them to shut down. The September 2020 Yelp: Local Economic Impact Report reflects that restaurants were the hardest hit by the pandemic with some 32,109 restaurant closures between March and August 31, with 61% reported as permanently closed. The National Restaurant Association reports that 110,000 eating and drinking establishments closed as of December 1, 2020. Employing 12.5 million people, with 9 in 10 restaurants employing fewer than 50 people, many of these establishments remain vulnerable to the long-term economic recovery from the pandemic. The Restaurant Revitalization Fund is long awaited help for one of America's hardest hit industries.

As part of the $1.9 trillion American Rescue Plan Act signed into law on March 11, 2021, the Restaurant Revitalization Fund allocates $28.6 billion in financial assistance to help restaurants and other eligible businesses stay open.
